

Justice

Justice is the quality of being just or moral rightness. Without justice, the world would be chaos. Justice punishes criminals so we can keep the world safe. We punish criminals so the people of the society feel safer and to let other criminals know what's going to happen to them soon enough. We use it to scare away people from committing crimes so less people will commit them. We punish criminals so they won't do it again. They knew what they were getting into, but they chose to do it. So we have to teach them a lesson and show them that what they do is against the law. Right now, in Canada, our justice system is not very good. The police can not enforce the law properly. It's almost like they aren't allowed to chase the criminal because our "justice system" says it isn't right. But if the police officers have to act like little girls. They aren't going to catch any criminals. Like during the riot during the Stanley Cup Playoffs. The police barely did anything to stop them. They couldn't do anything because the law forbids them. So the people kept on going, they went so far they even flipped a police car and lit it on fire. How we solve problems in Canada isn't very good. All we want to be is "fair" to someone who has done wrong. For example: in Canada, there have been cases where a criminal has killed, raped and abused people and they don't get sentenced to life in prison. They even get a chance to get bailed out. Which is completely unfair because if they get bailed out they're going to commit crimes again. All criminals, if they murder or rape more than one person, they should get sentenced to life or at least fifty years in prison with no chance of bail. Even fifty years is cutting them some slack.
